PRODUCT RECALL

Don't Fall For a Recall

Cybercriminals are sending emails that appear to be from Amazon, claiming a recently purchased item has been recalled
and offering a refund.

The catch, you ask? The email is a phishing scam designed to steal your Amazon login credentials.

What to do when you receive this email.
If you receive a recall notice, don't click any links. Instead, visit Amazon directly through the app or official website to verify the claim.

Click on the bus above to explore their mobile recreation programs for 2026!

Be cautious of vague emails that don't identify the product or explain the safety issue, and remember that scammers often create a sense of urgency to trick you into acting before you think.

Stay alert: When in doubt, stop, verify, and never click suspicious links.
